

PENNSYLVANIA HONORS HER DEAD

The blessings of the Almighty upon those whose husbands, brothers and sweethearts were left as orphans at Cold Harbor, and called down the divine grace on those present and the reunited country.

"Dixie," an air that has become national, was played, and Mrs. Watson took her position at the base of the monument. At the signal, she pulled the cord and the veil fell away. Cheers and the refrain of the Star-Spangled Banner mingled together, and the veterans, with reverent heads, gazed upon the inscription, which stated for what the monument stood in the hearts of Pennsylvania.

Presidential Speech.
The presentation address was made by P. D. Bricker, treasurer of Company F, Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, brevet major United States Volunteers, who gave the address on the movement to erect the monument.

In a characteristic speech, Governor Stuart accepted the monument on behalf of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. His words were few, but deemed it a gracious thing that the monument to Pennsylvania soldiers should stand on Virginia soil, and proclaimed it as a heritage for the people of both Commonwealths, saying that he felt assured it would be as well protected here as in the Keystone State.

"Virginians," he said, "their children and their children's children will see here where Pennsylvania soldiers offered up their services, and will look upon this monument as standing for patriotism and heroism as much as do their own monuments. It stands for the highest type of Pennsylvania manhood and of American patriotism."

General Davis Accepts.
The Governor's address was greeted with a volley of cheers. He was followed, in response, by General George B. Davis, judge advocate-general of the United States Army, who, after reviewing the history of the battle of Cold Harbor, said:

"The great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania does well to pay this appropriate and enduring tribute to the memory of her heroic dead. The material prosperity which so generously abounds within her borders is in no small measure due to the devoted self-sacrifice of her sons, who here paid the 'last full measure of devotion.' That government of the people, by the people and for the people should not perish from the earth."

"To their valor it is due that the abundant prosperity which she now enjoys was possible, that her Commonwealth, in the hands of the War Department and the government of the United States, this beautiful and enduring monument to the memory of the soldiers of Pennsylvania, who here gave their lives for their country."

As the acute pains of the War Department and the government of the United States, this beautiful and enduring monument to the memory of the soldiers of Pennsylvania, who here gave their lives for their country."

"The general government cheerfully charges itself with the custody of this visible and enduring memorial of their valor and fortitude and equally charges itself with the preservation of the story of their heroic deeds, which has been made the subject of abiding record in the capital of this Commonwealth, there to remain, I trust, until the earth and the sea shall give up their dead."

Brilliant Oration.
Hon. Henry M. Foote, Company A, 15th Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers, followed in a brilliant oration, in which he descended the honor of the services which could so far activate men that they could array themselves on opposing sides and fight to the death. His was a fiery address, in which he expounded the deeds of the Pennsylvania soldiers, in nowise detracting from the tribute given to those who moved them down at the battle of Cold Harbor. Dr. Theodore A. Worrall, a private in Company B, Ninety-seventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, also delivered a beautiful peroration, extolling the heroism of the sons of the Quaker State and of the sons of the South. He characterized the Civil War as the greatest in history.

"England," he said, "can point to Waterloo, where the loss of life was 12 per cent. of those engaging in battle, but American historians can point to the battle of Gettysburg as a greater conflict still, for there the loss of men reached up to 25 per cent. of those who participated. He delved deep into the history of nations to prove his assertion that the Civil War was the greatest on record, and characterized by bravery and devotion to belief."

Thomas J. Stewart, of Morristown, Pa., also made a short address to an attentive audience.

Col. Musgrave's Welcome.
Colonel Elmer C. Musgrave, chief of the Governor's staff, represented Governor Swanson in the latter's enforced absence, and bade the visitors, or pilgrims rather, welcome to Virginia. He assured them that their monument would never be touched by vandal hand, and that it would be cherished as sacredly here as it is revered in the home of those whom it commemorated. Congressman John A. Lamb also made a vigorous and hospitable address, and the ceremonies of the day were closed by the invocation of the Rev. L. C. Edmond, of Company I, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth Regiment.

Before they left the historic spot, to which they had made a pilgrimage as men of old used to visit sacred shrines, many of the visiting veterans walked about the battleground and pointed out the spots which they best remembered—spots where they had been wounded, or where they had seen their comrades die. Many cut sticks to take home as souvenirs. All walked through the little cemetery, seeking the name of some former comrade. There was, perhaps, not one among the hundreds there yesterday who had been to the battlefield since the fight. Yet most of them remembered the lay of the land, and could point out the positions held by the various regiments.

The Monument.
The monument stands facing southward. It is thirty feet three inches high. It commemorates the dead who lie at its feet and the participation in the engagement of seventy-nine Pennsylvania regiments. The emblem is a keystone engraved in granite and the Pennsylvania coat of arms. On its southern face one may read:

Erected by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania
Which Participated in the Operations From May 31 to June 13, 1864, Incident to and During the Battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia. June 1-3, 1864.

CAMPFIRES OF WAR-TIMES RELIGHTED

These Pennsylvania regiments most generally represented at the Cold Harbor dedication held reunions at Murkys' Hotel last night. The affairs were held separately, and were the regular annual meetings of the veterans, the first held in the Southern States.

The regiments holding the largest meetings were the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, the Fifty-ninth Regiment, and the Seventy-sixth and the One Hundred and Forty-second (the "Bucktails"). Officers were elected for the year at each meeting, reports were made as to financial conditions, the rosters of the dead of the year were read, and usual routine business transacted. For the most part the veterans decided to hold their reunions next year at Harrisburg, during the session of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Then the campfires were relighted, and the men who engaged in the futile struggle of the Federals at Cold Harbor related many a reminiscence of the fight. The opinion was freely and with great unanimity expressed that the name of the battleground was a distinct misnomer, as during the battle there was anything but cold, and no sense a harbor for the Union army.

Reminiscences of War.
"I had a much better time today than I did on the same ground forty-five years ago," said Comrade Foster of the Fifty-ninth. Mr. Foster is the baby of the regiment, being only sixty years of age. He was described as his company commander as the "ornamental kid in the Army of the Potomac." Comrade Foster said he found the very swamp in which he and his comrades vainly tried to get out of the range of Confederate bullets and shells on that memorable day in 1864. One comrade told a hitherto unrecited incident of the battle. He said a young man in the Northern army was badly wounded in the battle and was unable to walk. Two comrades started to help him to get to the rear, but the Confederates were in hot pursuit, and it looked like certain capture. The two older men at last told the youth they must leave him or all three would be taken. He begged for further aid, and they struggled on for some time longer. Then they decided to winch that boy. Their effort would be useless, and dropped the wounded boy. "Then that blamed kid got up and out-run 'em both," declared the veteran.

Colonel's Daughters Speak.
In the meeting of the Fifty-ninth the veterans would not be content until they had heard from the three daughters and three grandchildren present of their old colonel, "Dick" White. One of the daughters, Mrs. Watson, unveiled the monument yesterday.

Colonel Watson died on the day Lincoln was shot, of rheumatism contracted while in the army. His aged daughters were warmly greeted by the old soldiers.

The roll of dead for the year in the Fifty-ninth included twenty-five names, an extremely heavy loss. As Secretary Hissong said, but a few more years would elapse before all reunions must be held in another world.

The reunion of the Thirteenth Cavalry was made notable by the presence of its commander, Colonel Jacob H. J. Watson. Although seventy-nine years old, he is hale and hearty. Colonel Deves and his cavalry held the right flank of Grant's army at Cold Harbor for the longest time in the battle, and the one's existence. The fire in the old commander's eye and the earnestness expressed in his words proclaimed the fact that he was still a fighting man.

Heavy Losses in Battle.
The "Bucktails" held a stirring meeting last night with the emblem of his regiment in his hat, had something to say of the days when this badge made the regiment notable on the field. Two of its colonels were killed, more than half of the men were left dead on the fields of conflict, and it participated in all the great battles of the Civil War, from Bull Run and Chancellorsville.

Many of the veterans will leave the city today, though some will remain until the end of the week. Those who did not arrive until Tuesday night will visit the historic scenes in and around the city. A very few of us will ever see Richmond again, said one of them. "But no matter how long we may have to live, this reunion will be remembered as one of the events of our lives."

PENNSYLVANIANS RETURN

Governor Stuart and Staff Left the City for the North Early Last Night. Governor Stuart, accompanied by his staff, and the members of his staff, who were here yesterday for the exercises at Cold Harbor, left for the North last night immediately after taking supper at the Jefferson Hotel. The party returned to the hotel late in the afternoon and had but a short time to wait.

Members of the staff who registered with the Governor at the Jefferson were as follows: Colonels Thomas J. Stewart, Harrisburg; H. R. Rupp, Scranton; Joseph K. Weaver, Norris; H. L. Holderman, Philadelphia; Lewis T. Brown, Pittsburg; H. C. Treuler, Allentown; W. L. Bradley, Philadelphia; Lewis E. Bur, Philadelphia; John R. Wiggins, Philadelphia; J. W. Hutchins, Philadelphia; F. Quisey, Philadelphia; Major John H. Duval, Philadelphia; Major C. H. Worman, Philadelphia; H. H. Harrisburg; C. H. Harrisburg; Thomas B. Harper, Philadelphia; John Salter, Philadelphia.

BEADLES'S BEHAVIOR DISGRACES VIRGINIA

With what was generally declared to be most outrageous conduct, Cary L. Beadles, a justice of the peace in Hanover county, yesterday, during the ceremonies incident to the unveiling of the monument to the Pennsylvania dead at Cold Harbor, made himself extremely annoying to a large concourse of people, who, because they were necessarily some distance from the speakers, could not hear because of the boisterous proclamations of authority which continually emanated from the magistrate. Several persons among the prominent Richmonders were outspoken in their disgust at what they termed Beadles's disgraceful behavior, and Thomas B. Eickes, of Richmond, who was much inconvenienced by the magistrate's annoyances, stated that he would make direct complaint to the judge of the Hanover County Court.

Among the witnesses of the alleged misconduct are Ridgway Moore, a prominent Richmond lawyer; Postmaster Edgar Allan, who it was said, also complained; Ben Owen, secretary to the Governor; several other Richmond people, and many county people.

One of Beadles's first acts was to go up to three women sitting on the roadside in their carriage and abruptly ordered them to move off. One demurred, whereupon he roughly said that he would make them move. "Get out of the way," he shouted, and took the reins of the carriage of the horses of the head and forced the women out of hearing of the speakers. The women were defenseless, but, nevertheless, Beadles was unusually discourteous towards them. They afterwards drove off. The magistrate also forced Frank Shown, who was accompanied by a female companion, to move, though it was declared that the latter's vehicle was on the side of the road and not interfering with traffic. In the presence of many Beadles also threatened to pull a Pennsylvania veteran from the wagon he was in because the latter remonstrated with him, when Beadles tried to pull one of the mules from the road. Another veteran complained that he could not hear because of the loud utterances of authority made by the justice of the peace, and the latter replied to the effect that he did not care if the veteran didn't hear.

In company with County Sheriff James Jones he levied a license tax of $5.75 on a lunch stand, which had been established for the convenience of the veterans, who would have been practically without food otherwise, and a like amount on a smaller lunch stand, and also on a man selling a few souvenirs. Sheriff Jones levied the receipts as deputy treasurer.

Complaint against the magistrate, especially his behavior towards the Pennsylvania veterans, was very bitter, and it is probable that other communications will be addressed to the Hanover court.
